

Hello,

I want to voice my objection to divulge personal financial information to a sales person selling 'exempt market securities'.

I have been investing for many years in a number of diversified investment opportunities and understand the risks associated with all of them. I believe divulging my personal financial information to a person that is selling an opportunity in 'exempt market securities' would only provide the sales person with a further opportunity to sell me more investments.

I feel the questions currently asked by the majority of mutual fund marketers are sufficient to determine my investment risk profile without getting into the details of my financial position.

Thank you,

Harry W Fech
